

Statement by Chris Daly and David Liggins

8 August 2016

We are delighted and honoured to have been appointed Editors of Analysis. We aim to reinforce the journal's reputation as the venue of choice for excellent short papers in philosophy. In a change to traditional Analysis policy, we will be happy to publish excellent short papers on any area of philosophy, including the history of philosophy. Our goal is simply to publish the best papers.

Under our editorship, a large majority of submissions will be sent to referees. To help the journal run smoothly, we will be using the ScholarOne platform. This will be open for submissions from 1 September 2016, the day we officially take over as Editors, via:

<https://mc.manuscriptcentral.com/analysis>.

Analysis will maintain its current policy of triple anonymity: the Editors and Associate Editors receive anonymized submissions, as do referees, and authors are not informed of the identity of referees. Word limits are unchanged: the absolute maximum is 4000 words. Shorter papers will be preferred to longer papers, other things being equal. Because of the intense pressure on space, we have a policy of not publishing responses to papers that have appeared in other journals.

Our approach to Analysis owes much to our experience as Associate Editors of the Australasian Journal of Philosophy. We would like to thank Stephen Hetherington, the current editor of the AJP, and Stewart Candlish, his predecessor, for all we have learned from them. We are grateful to the Analysis Committee, for appointing us; to Michael Clark, our predecessor, for his time as Editor; to Isabel Gois, the Editorial Assistant of Analysis, and all at Oxford University Press, for all their help; and to the following for agreeing to collaborate with us as Associate Editors:

Sara J. Bernstein (University of Notre Dame)

Stephanie Collins (University of Manchester)

Jason Decker (Carleton College)

Debbie Roberts (University of Edinburgh).